It is now possible to find the answer to almost any question at the click of a mouse; the internet is like having the biggest library in the world at your fingertips!

But all that information on the web belongs to someone. It has been created by someone and the text, images and ideas are someone's intellectual property. So, while the internet has made it easy to get hold of information, it's also made it easy to copy it. But ... the fact remains that using and presenting someone else's work as your own is plagiarism.

Plagiarism isn't allowed at school or college. It's considered to be cheating, so it's important to understand how to avoid accidentally doing it. Many universities now use computer programs that can scan a student's work and detect plagiarism, which means that those who plagiarise, accidentally or otherwise, are more likely than ever to be caught.
